A Step-by-Step Guide on How Patients Can Provide Input on Drug Technology Assessments

September 11, 2012

Hello,

Patient input on drug reviews is important to the pan-Canadian Oncology Drug Review (pCODR) drug review process as it ensures patients' experiences of living with cancer and undergoing treatment are routinely considered as part of the pCODR Drug Review Process. pCODR seeks a consultant or an agency to do the following:

- Design, develop and prepare a user-friendly "A Step-by-Step Guide on How Patients Can Provide Input on Drug Technology Assessments" for patient advocacy groups with completion of this project to occur within four months of the start date.
- Design, develop and implement a web-based survey for patient advocacy groups to help with the determination of gaps in knowledge relating to the collection of meaningful patient input and to determine appropriate content for the "A Step-by-Step Guide on How Patients Can Provide Input on Drug Technology Assessments".
- Interpret the results of the web-based survey and apply the knowledge gained into the creation of a highly usable "A Step-by-Step Guide on How Patients Can Provide Input on Drug Technology Assessments" for patient advocacy groups.
